Starkville Public Library & MSU’s Day One Leadership presents

THE CHRONICLES OF NARNIA

For The Daily News

The long-awaited scavenger hunt around the library and a bag of chocolate coins, “treasure” from Narnia. Best Overall Costume, while Zach Meints as Puzzle the Donkey won the Most Authoritative Costume Award.

The students not only put on a show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored

While Saturday’s event is over, the Day One students and the Day One Leadership Community is a wonderful program designed for incoming freshmen at Mississippi State University. The students not only pour themselves into putting on an show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored

The students not only put on a show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored

While Saturday’s event is over, the Day One students and the Day One Leadership Community is a wonderful program designed for incoming freshmen at Mississippi State University. The students not only pour themselves into putting on an show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored

While Saturday’s event is over, the Day One students and the Day One Leadership Community is a wonderful program designed for incoming freshmen at Mississippi State University. The students not only pour themselves into putting on an show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored

While Saturday’s event is over, the Day One students and the Day One Leadership Community is a wonderful program designed for incoming freshmen at Mississippi State University. The students not only pour themselves into putting on an show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored

While Saturday’s event is over, the Day One students and the Day One Leadership Community is a wonderful program designed for incoming freshmen at Mississippi State University. The students not only pour themselves into putting on an show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored

While Saturday’s event is over, the Day One students and the Day One Leadership Community is a wonderful program designed for incoming freshmen at Mississippi State University. The students not only pour themselves into putting on an show, but they also partner with local organizations to better serve the community. Scholars are divided into small groups of between four and seven members called action teams; each action team has a mentor from the MSU faculty or staff, and a group of services which also has the help of an older MSU student leader enlisted in the Appalachian Leadership Honors Program. Each Day One student completes required service hours as well as working with the rest of their teammates on a larger budgeted project. For several months now, five MSU freshmen have been volunteering at the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored in the children’s section at the Starkville Public Library. Working closely with librarian Laura Foxworth, these students have labored